Atlanta's Appeal to the Board of Education

Atlanta, Ga., May 31, 1915

To the Honorable Board of Education:
Gentlemen:

As citizens of Atlanta, Ga., many of us patrons of the public schools of the city, in the exercise of the right of petition, which is the fundamental of constitutional liberty, we respectfully petition your honorable body to discourage any and all efforts to plunge the public school system of the city into the hot-bed of politics. We do not make this request in a spirit of hostile antagonism toward any one, but simply stand on the solid foundation of common sense and justice toward the city's most precious asset, the public schools.

Unquestionably the greatest institution in American life and the one having the most pronounced influence on our civilization is the public school. Therefore, it is a self-evident truth that the public school is not the place to play politics. The welfare of the more than 25,000 pupils attending the public schools of Atlanta is far too vital to the future to be marred by political intrigue, either directly or indirectly.

We are satisfied that your honorable body desires to know the wishes of the people of Atlanta and work in harmony with them. We are satisfied with the executive ability and scholarship of Professor W. M. Slaton, and we respectfully urge that you re-elect him Superintendent of Public Schools and retain intact his efficient corps of assistants.

The present condition of the Public Schools in this city is largely traceable to lack of funds, and we believe that the city council, in its sound business judgment, will provide for all reasonable demands of the city's schools.

To this petition, which is submitted to the Board of Education, 10,860 citizens have voluntarily signed their names, showing their appreciation of Professor Slaton's untiring energy, zeal and ability in making Atlanta's Public Schools the best in the entire Southland.

GERMANS CAPTURE 300,000 RUSSIANS DURING PAST MONTH

(Continued from First Page) Rumania against Austria and Bulgaria against Turkey. The army staffs of the two powers are said to be busy co-ordinating military plans.

As a consequence of the second Balkan war, Rumania took from Bulgaria a large slice of territory and added it to her territory on the south.

The Rumanian army is now on the march against Bulgaria. It is one of the most fertile districts in Europe. The chief town is Temesvar.

Rumania Orders Half Million Pairs of Shoes

Rumania Reported to Be Mobilizing 1,000,000 Men

LONDON, June 2.—Rumania now is occupying the "seat of uneasy neutrality" held by Italy. The diplomats of the near east evidently are working hard to bring an understanding between Bulgaria and Rumania.

The German press is showing some indications of anxiety over the situation and the French are making overtures for concessions to prevent Rumanian intervention.

The Russian are reported as being heavily reinforced along the River Danube, but the official accounts of operations at this point continue contradictory.

French Claim Progress and Capture of Prisoners

(By Associated Press) PARIS, June 2.—The French war office this afternoon gave out the following: "In the sector to the north of Arras the fighting continued last night."

"In the other parts of this sector, particularly at Lovette, there was artillery fighting yesterday."

"Along the remainder of the front there is nothing to report with the exception of two bombardments on Rheims, and particularly of the cathedral in that city."

Serbian Are Disturbing German Communications

(By Associated Press) HAVRE, France, June 2.—The following official statement was issued last night regarding the operations of the Belgian army:

"A fierce artillery duel marked the day of May 31 along the Belgian front. Belgian guns of all calibers missed their fire, blowing up the enemy's trenches and accessory defenses at a number of points."

"All the roads beyond the German front are commandeered by the Belgians, making it very difficult for the enemy to bring up fresh supplies."

"The first line of Belgian troops by a continuous line prevented German troops from advancing."

Serbian Will Bar German Language From Schools

(By Associated Press) BEOGRAD, June 1.—Via Paris, June 2.—Serbian feeling for Italy is the warmest, says a Nish correspondent of the Journal d'Italie. "If Italy entered the war deliberately against the Austro-German coalition it is a sign that the Italian-Serbian negotiations have been concluded so that the Balkan question has been virtually solved."

"The same correspondent declares information received from Trieste has provoked indignation. It is reported in the Serbian capital that an attempted ruse by Italians has been sternly suppressed by the Serbs and that a large number of pro-Italian residents of Trieste have lost their lives or have been wounded."

growth of the automobile in American. Thousands of people, it was said, were plunging into debt and were sacrificing primary needs to gratify a whim of fashion. Soon or late, the grim prophets declared, a day of reckoning would arrive and the country's business would be terribly shaken, if not utterly smashed. But the purchase of automobiles has gone steadily on, multiplying from year to year, and general conditions are sounder and thrifter today than ever. Undoubtedly there have been cases of individual extravagance, but the total result has been distinctly constructive. For one thing, as the Courier-Journal notes, the automobile industry has led to the establishment of great manufacturing plants which give employment to many thousands of workmen at good wages and thus has helped solve the problem of finding remunerative labor for an ever-increasing population. Further:

Where America Stands.

Germany has failed in her design to draw the United States into a prolonged controversy over technicalities and to continue in the meantime her flagrant disregard of American rights. It is evident from Washington dispatches that the President's forthcoming note will demand a straightforward, conclusive answer to this all-important question: Will Germany be governed by international law or will she persist in piracy and barbarism?

There will be no temporizing, no tolerance of Berlin's impudent quibbles, no inch of yielding from our Government's firm stand on the principles of justice and humanity. If diplomatic relations are to be preserved, Germany must say promptly and unequivocally whether or not she will recompense American losses and guarantee an immediate cessation of her outrageous practices.

The Kaiser's submarines have deliberately killed more than one hundred innocent Americans, men, women and children, and have ruthlessly overridden the laws of civilization. Our demand for reparation for these wrongs and for assurances that they would not be repeated has been met with misstatements of fact and with idle pettifoggery. The Administration realizes that there can be no further parity. It is determined to speak finally and, if need be, to act with unflinching positiveness.

In this policy, the President is supported by a united American people. Never were the thought and sentiment of the United States so solidly arrayed behind a President as they are in this issue.

Pretzle is stumbling but not yet fallen.

All rain and no sunshine makes a big hay crop in the cotton fields.

Too Much of a Good Thing.

The present tariff law as it came from the House contained a clause, inserted at the instance of Mr. Underwood, which allowed a discount of five per cent on dutiable goods imported in American ships, the object being thus to encourage the upbuilding of a native merchant marine. This clause encountered much opposition in the Senate on the ground that it was contrary to the "favored nation" agreement in a number of treaties between the United States and foreign Governments, and finally it was amended so as to except such treaty agreements. In this rather confusing form, the five per cent discount provision became a part of the tariff law.

But the Administration, it appears, looked askance at this exemption, which certainly smacked of subsidy, and declined to press an enforcement of the clause. At last, however, the matter has been passed upon by the United States Customs Court, which rules that the discount must be granted not only for merchandise imported in ships of American registry but also for that brought over in the ships of any other country which has a "favored nation" agreement with the United States. Under this decision, the result will be that the intended discrimination in favor of American vessels will be ineffectual, in as much as the same discount will be allowed a number of foreign countries. Furthermore, if the Supreme Court sustains the Customs Court, the Government will be called upon to pay importers some fifteen million dollars.

This a well-meant plan to foster a merchant marine has turned out to be too much of a good thing. American ship owners lose the supposed discrimination, and the American treasury is in peril of losing millions of revenue. The way to get a merchant marine, of which the United States is in urgent need, is not through favoring special interests but through grappling the problem broadly in the whole country's behalf. The Administration's Ship Purchase bill which would have met this need adequately and promptly, was lost in filibuster. It remains to be seen whether private capital will meet the exigencies of the time; if not, then the Government's duty to act will be more than ever imperative.

All is distinctly not quiet along the Rio Grande. Indications are that the forces of the boll weevil are bombarding the forts on the Alabama side.

Results From the Automobile.

The Courier-Journal recalls the quaint fact that when carriages were introduced in England a cautious member of Parliament offered a bill "to restrain the excessive use of coaches lest the country become impoverished." It appears further that ballads were written in romantic lament for the good old times when folk went sturdily afoot or on horseback and that sermons were delivered against the wild, wicked extravagance of riding in vehicles. But carriages became more and more popular, and the wealth of the realm, far from being drained, actually increased.

"A vast amount of business has been developed as a direct result of the extension of the radius of parcel and heavier freight delivery to customers, and as a result of the ability of the 'city drummer' and the commercial traveler in the country to 'make' a far greater number of points than he formerly was able to reach. In many other ways the motor vehicle nets a profit. A single American factory is turning out 1,000 automobiles a day. The country is not poorer, but richer, than it was in the nineties, and is absorbing the output of a long list of factories which annually increase their capacity."

Most important of all, perhaps, has been the influence of the automobile in the improvement of highways. In point of time, the great campaigns for good roads in the United States coincide with the perfection and the extensive use of motor vehicles. The need for good roads was recognized and felt long decades before, but significantly enough there were few if any organized movements to obtain good roads until the advent of the automobile. Wagons and other horse-drawn vehicles could muddle along somehow through bogs and ruts, but to the motor car well-built and well-kept highways were a necessity. Hence when thousands of people bought automobiles, they became so many crusaders for better roads.

The value of the interest thus aroused is beyond reckoning. Improved roads mean increased land values, freer marketing, quickened trade, a larger school attendance and a general enrichment of the community's life. To these ends, the automobile undoubtedly has contributed. Once a toy of the rich, it has become a vehicle of pleasure and health and service for the many. True, it has tempted some to extravagance, but it has aided thousands of others to economy, and has opened vast fields of industrial activity and progress.

Two soldiers spring up for every one that is left in the trench.

Vacant Lot Gardening.

Vacant lot gardening as a municipal enterprise was inaugurated some twenty years ago by Mayor Plingree, of Detroit, as a means of helping the unemployed in that community. Through the generous co-operation of property owners the city was given the use of several thousand unimproved lots. The land was plowed and fertilized, seeds were contributed and hundreds of persons grasped the opportunity to raise food supplies of their own. So successful was the experiment that the value of the first season's crops amounted to thirteen thousand dollars. The idea has spread from city to city until now it is nation-wide. In Philadelphia more than eight hundred families are cultivating vacant lots, and the vegetables thus produced are said to be worth between fifty and sixty thousand dollars a year. The same plan has been carried out with fruitful results in Newark, New York, Washington, Cleveland, Cincinnati and Chicago. The benefits are not limited to the individual gardeners but are shared by the property owners and by the entire community. The land is steadily improved, the city's productive resources are increased, and waste places that formerly were cluttered with trash are transformed to spots of verdure and beauty.

A Young Man's Chance in South America

An interesting item of the times appears in the following letter which has been sent by a leading New York bank to several law graduates:

"We would like to get in touch with a few students graduating this year who have specialized in economics, especially in money and banking courses, and who have a practical knowledge of Spanish or Portuguese. We want men who are capable of becoming big men and who are willing to work in South America. This presents a wonderful opportunity for a young man."

That is a sign, one among myriads, of the developing interest in Latin-American fields of business diplomacy. The Springfield (Mass.) Republican observes that in New England colleges many boys are now studying with a view to equipping themselves for such service. "In the old days," it adds, "when our ships went to the Far East and their owners had counting houses in China, some who became business leaders of their time early ventured far and were trained for large things. So now the youth of the present and the future are going to find their chance through this South American development, in which the United States is bound to have an increasingly large share." It should be emphasized, however, that young men who expect more than a merely adventurous lot in those regions should be well prepared.

As a matter of fact, very few excuses ever ex-

The Art of Playing.

BY R. ADDINGTON BRUCE.
 It is just as important for a man to know how to play as to know how to work. Many men, because of their ignorance of the fundamental principles of playing, are doing serious trouble on their jobs. One day last summer I met in a city a friend, an energetic and successful business man, whom I had not seen for some months. Noticing that he looked tired and overworked, I suggested that he should take a vacation on his appearance, that he ought to take a vacation. "A vacation?" he echoed. "Why, hang it all, I have just returned from a vacation. That is the trouble with me. My vacation has tired me out." "What did you do?" I asked him. "Oh, I loafed, fished and played a little golf. I took a long drive, I can assure you. But I feel more used up than when I quit work." There are a good many men and women on whom vacations have this effect. The trouble with such people is that they do not know how to play. The purpose of a play is twofold. It is a device for relieving mind and body through pleasurable occupation. It is also a sure way for relieving the stress of continuous attention to routine affairs. In order to play effectively certain rules must be observed, just as in a game as to be observed in order to win effectively.

First and foremost, whatever the form of play one chooses it must be carried on in such a way as really to amuse, put a strain on, the player.

Golf, for example, is pretty sure to work more mischief than good in a player who sets himself too high standards and tries to become overworked and irritated at every bungling shot he makes. Golf will be of much benefit to a player who tenses his endeavors, hole after hole, to outdo his companion on the links. Any game played in this manner will wear the spirit will take far more out of a man than it puts into him.

Besides draining his nervous energy, it has a self-centering effect that prevents any true diversion of mind. Instead of helping the player to "get away from himself," it only increases his self-thinking.

Patience is another quality that is necessary in such games, or take only those forms of exercise, which make a strong appeal to one's personal desires.

Any game played in this manner will wear the spirit will take far more out of a man than it puts into him.

Even while at play, his thoughts will be centered to center about his personal affairs and worries, and the purpose of play to give mental diversion will be defeated.

Lives Mean More Than Dollars.

It was pointed out when certain interests were urging the administration to send a "sharp" note to Great Britain demanding payment for detained American cargoes that the grievance of the owners could not be very serious, since they had not so far presented their bills. The British Foreign office has announced that it is ready and anxious to make this payment at once, but that the representative of the owners in London has declined to receive the information on which to base his claim. In view of this refusal it is shown by Great Britain that Great Britain has offered against American rights only in a less degree than Germany, and that the British Foreign office is prepared to meet the claims should both belligerents agree. All that consideration aside, the moral sense rebels at putting lost dollars in the scale with lives.

Not from this point of view, is there any comparison between British and German offenses. We may argue as we like about the effective blockade and the continuation of the war, but it remains that the consideration for our commerce has been shown by Great Britain at every stage of the proceedings, while Germany has ignored every protest against her unprecedented breaches of international law.

The president has fortunately seen and avoided it. . . . And he spoke out so strongly and well in the note he has now awaiting the answer that it would have been better to send him a copy of the minor consideration divert him from the main issue. It will not hurt the claimants against Great Britain to welcome the answer they have made out their bills.—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

Be A Mrs. Happy Heart.

BY R. K. WHOLEY.
 Yesterday morning the sun above a little breeze whispered, the scent of the meadows poured pleasant feelings all over the landscape, and everybody ought to have been extremely happy. But I walked half a mile with a young woman who saw flaws in what had been a perfect day. It was too warm. It was too bright. The dust of the street into my eyes. How these factory chimneys did smoke! What a smell there was from somebody's uncovered garbage can—some people are so careless and inconsiderate. Wasn't it a shame to see a walk for a girl to get muddy? Why didn't the city sprinkle the streets better? Etc., etc. Yes, she left me with a groan and an uncomfortable feeling that everything was wrong. But on the morning of this writing, when the sky threatened a gloomy day, I walked with another woman. And when we were far from the place, and if the sky step was lighter and there were beetles even in the lowering sky. The trees bent low under the wind, were alive in a joyous tinkle, and a hedge of roses sent their perfume toward us in a June wish for happiness. "It couldn't be a better day," sighed my companion, in perfect bliss. It is at this second woman who walked with me that a mutual friend once said: "She knows so many lovely people. I think she is a very fortunate woman." I contrasted her with my companion of the previous day, who, seemingly, has no worthwhile friends, for she can speak of none without flaws. Then it occurred to me that the reason why some girls are "fortunate" in knowing "so many lovely people" is in the quality of being lovely ones, self, and of being able to discern the excellences in other. My little friend of the second morning honestly believes that she knows the finest people in the world. She has placed each one of them upon a little pedestal and has never looked at one of them through that cruel magnifying glass of criticism which discovers all the little flaws and faults. She is always revealing hidden beauties in a friend's character. Just as she found them in that gloomy day. She never looks for the more or less, and if the accidentally should find one, from some magic source there'd come quickly a healing balm, so that one would think of her as having found the place that she might seek the pain.

Quips and Quiddities

"How did you get your clothes torn and your face bruised as you were?" asked the woman.
 "My car," was the cautious reply, "is the result of a slide to second base."
 "But I thought you were umpiring the game?"
 "I was. I told you. I didn't want to let it."
 "Sorry not to have heard your lecture last night," said the loudest member of the group.
 "I know you must have a weakening influence upon everybody says it was splendid."
 "I wonder how they found out," said Mr. Frookcock.
 "The lecture, you know, was postponed."

AMERICAN INDUSTRIAL ART

BY FREDERICK H. HAINES.
 THE United States is just now being awakened to a realization of the dependence of many lines of industry upon art. The effectiveness of the gown a woman wears, of the furniture that fills her house, the china upon her table, rises largely upon the artistic quality of the materials that are used. A piece of clay may have been worth a penny. Shaped with a certain degree of skill into a dish it took on a value of 25 cents. In the hands of a better artist it became a masterpiece. The same piece of metal, the work of the master back of it and the skill of the well-trained workmen in its execution, it may have taken on a value a hundred times as great. The increase in value is due to the dependence of the industry upon the demonstrated the dollars and cents value of art as a basis for certain industries.

One of the facts of this situation is that, in certain of the industries that require the greatest amount of artistic appreciation combined with mechanical skill, it has leaned heavily upon the older countries of Europe. The making of pottery, for instance, requires a rare combination of art and skill. The designer must be an artist and more. He must know all the possibilities in his design. He and the skilled potter must supplement each other. They have grown into an effective working team through long association.

Along the border of France and Germany, in the region now devastated by war, have dwelt a people who have been making pottery for centuries. The art and craft of it have been handed down from one generation to another. There is a complete understanding between designer and workman. The result is a very superior product which is difficult for the same industry in a new country to equal. Similar conditions exist in many other industries.

As a result of this situation American manufacturers have quite generally depended upon Europe, particularly for their designs. The value of textiles depends materially on the artistic merits of their patterns, and it is especially true of the finer grades. Instead of making their own designs, sent men abroad to select from those that might be purchased from a ready-made industrial artist, they have preferred to get satisfactory results in this way has interfered with the development of competent designers in America.

It is still claimed that the American designer, while he has been artistically trained, has not had enough of the mechanical end of manufacture to make himself effective. The condition of chaos in Europe has interfered with the activities of its industrial artists. America is being thrown on its own resources. While this situation exists, the American Federation of Arts is a real and a very important factor in the greater development of industrial art training and at the same time to show that worth-while work is possible in a new industry. The association was organized at a convention of this association, held in May, was largely given over to a discussion of industrial art. As a result of the activity of the American Federation of Arts an imposing exhibition of the products of American firms has been placed on display at the National museum in Washington.

The result is a very superior product which is difficult for the same industry in a new country to equal. Similar conditions exist in many other industries.

As a result of this situation American manufacturers have quite generally depended upon Europe, particularly for their designs.

A CASTLE AND A GHOST

BY HERBERT COREY.
 "Let each will with all his strength that this woman of the castle appear. Do you comprehend?" Concentrate upon that thought. If these things that Morgan believes are true, perhaps we can force her crazier."

Perhaps that may be taken as an indication that Jacoby's cynicism was merely superficial. Perhaps he had known to his companions, broken beneath the strain of the day. Sometimes his manner was so violent. Morgan continued to take his meals with his usual regularity. But before midnight he would retreat to the shelter of the old woman.

"There was something different in the atmosphere the 'third night,' said Faulstich. 'I do not know what it was, but I felt a queer sense of foreboding. It had passed, perhaps, and I was about to suggest that we abandon the folly, when some one across the room spoke in a low voice with an odd, gasping sound. The effect was shocking in its character.'"

"No jokes," said the Poacher, in a trembling, savage voice. "No jokes. I—I will not permit it." He had loved to tell of his poaching exploits as a youth. He was a quiet, kindly man, shrewd in his peasant way, but very dangerous in battle. He is one of those men who go into a sort of catatonic during hard-to-hand conflict. For hours afterward his comrades feared to approach him. His eyes were glazed, and from would appear his life.

"No one spoke. I sat there, leaning forward in the darkness, trembling in an undefined apprehension. The felt—I swear I felt—a little hand placed in mine. It was the hand of a child, or a very young woman. Less and slender and tapering and very cold. I must have spoken in my agitation, for Jacoby addressed me: 'What is it, Morgan? You look as if you were in a trance.' It seemed to Faulstich, however, that there was something in Jacoby's tone. He made no reply. The hand was withdrawn. It had barely touched his, as if it seemed, that they continued to sit in the darkness. At last the Poacher spoke: "Let us go," said he, in a timorous tone. "I am cold."

"No," said Jacoby. "More time passed. At last Jacoby spoke in a shaken, raw voice—Faulstich spoke of it as raw—'which was the hand of a child, or a very young woman.' 'Now, Andre, my friend,' said he, 'we will go if you will.' The men rose in silence and groped their way to the door. As they approached it, the door had been taken again by that slender little hand in the darkness. But it was no longer cold. As the seven stumbled into the corridor, Faulstich heard some one laugh in that queer, silent way. It was the laugh of a very young and very happy woman. There was no suggestion of evil in it said—but it lacked something. It was as though the laughter had no soul. When the candles were lighted it was seen that the Poacher was wet with perspiration. "I go forward to the trenches tomorrow," he said loudly. "Tomorrow, I tell you. I go forward to the trenches."

The others laughed somewhat shakily. There was little talk among them. Jacoby did not speak at all. In the morning he seemed flushed, as though he had been drinking, and he talked a good deal. He was high about his neck. Faulstich asked him about it. "I must have hurt myself during the night," he said solemnly. "I can't continue to do this."

There was no more talk of continuing the search. Two others went with the Poacher to the trenches. Morgan would not come to the chateau at all. Jacoby formed the habit of sleeping all day long. At night after sitting silently about the fire for a time, he would leave the room in which the others slept. Sometimes he would be seen in the kitchen, where he would gain the impression that there was a woman in the house. "Did he not see—uh—uh," said he, very solemnly. "But he heard—uh—uh," said he, very solemnly. "I walked after having been asleep for hours. The door was open and I heard a door Jacoby said he had seen as though he were playing with some one. It was fuller, somehow—throbbing—with malice and an utter recklessness in it."

"He did not sleep that night," said Faulstich. "We heard laughter, and once—I am sure—a sound as though a woman in a white dress had walked along down the corridor. He was sitting at the table, and he had the boulder of the lady of the chateau. His neck was bare. A little trickle of blood from the wound had dried upon his breast."

That was the end of Faulstich's story. We asked Ben der if he believed—here. In this bright, holiday town with the sound of music and tramcars and the laughter of children in our ears.

and academic art, respectively, in this country, and the relative results that are derived from each. It is shown that there are 103 schools of art in the United States, with an enrollment of more than 100,000 pupils. The schools are trained to be painters, sculptors and illustrators. The schools are followed by the directors of those schools it was estimated that not more than 1 per cent of these students followed art as a profession after leaving school.

In the public schools of Europe a vast amount of attention is given to industrial art training. France has the longest history of industrial art training. France to be found in every town. They are schools, and they are high schools in America. It is held that the schools in France that have trained the production of materials that were useful in the production of art have been largely due to her public education. It was in 1880, at the great exposition in Paris that Germany found herself embarrassed by the artistic superiority of the products of France. With characteristic thoroughness, Germany immediately submitted her own products, established schools, and was soon teaching industrial art to all the schools. At a subsequent exposition ten years later she showed products that were close rivals to those of France. The result was that Germany's products were not confused with those of its rival, instead they were labeled, "Made in Germany," to be attached to all exhibitors of the latter. Thus did Germany's name become that has become a by-word for the world over.

The industrial art exhibition that is being shown at the National museum develops the fact that America has some factory products of workmanship which we feel proud. There are the tapestries, the may it be. The weaving of tapestries is an art that has changed little from the time of the ancient Egyptians. Some hand looms are used that play a part in those distant days. Albert Heiler, well known as a painter and mural decorator, is largely responsible for the revival of tapestry weaving in America. The industry, centering around New York City, is producing materials as good as are made anywhere in the world.

Cut glass is peculiarly an American art. Europeans do not go in for cut glass. As it is an art that has been originated in America and finds its chief market here, it is not surprising that it has been limited to this side of the ocean. This leaves the art in this peculiar industry practically without a rival.

The manufacture of pottery and china has been developed to its most effective showing in France and England. Yet there is a great deal of it turned out in America. There are many fine pottery works in the West, in Colorado and New Jersey, yet Ohio produces most of it. One of the great English manufacturers of pottery in the world is the American Pottery Works, which has been established in the United States. The American producers with the exception of a single plant which he mentioned and which, he said, made a good pottery as anybody in the world. It is claimed of the American manufacturer that he has within him a desire to furnish his establishment in accordance with artistic good taste. It is impossible to say how many of the average man in the world would be able to accomplish this end. For a single living room there is the matter of tables, chairs, rugs, curtains, wall decorations, sculpture, pictures, art objects. It is claimed of the American manufacturer that he must have advice as to what to do to accomplish this end. It is no mean task to execute a single room properly.

"I go forward to the trenches tomorrow," he said loudly. "Tomorrow, I tell you. I go forward to the trenches."

The others laughed somewhat shakily. There was little talk among them. Jacoby did not speak at all. In the morning he seemed flushed, as though he had been drinking, and he talked a good deal. He was high about his neck. Faulstich asked him about it. "I must have hurt myself during the night," he said solemnly. "I can't continue to do this."

There was no more talk of continuing the search. Two others went with the Poacher to the trenches. Morgan would not come to the chateau at all. Jacoby formed the habit of sleeping all day long. At night after sitting silently about the fire for a time, he would leave the room in which the others slept. Sometimes he would be seen in the kitchen, where he would gain the impression that there was a woman in the house. "Did he not see—uh—uh," said he, very solemnly. "But he heard—uh—uh," said he, very solemnly. "I walked after having been asleep for hours. The door was open and I heard a door Jacoby said he had seen as though he were playing with some one. It was fuller, somehow—throbbing—with malice and an utter recklessness in it."

"He did not sleep that night," said Faulstich. "We heard laughter, and once—I am sure—a sound as though a woman in a white dress had walked along down the corridor. He was sitting at the table, and he had the boulder of the lady of the chateau. His neck was bare. A little trickle of blood from the wound had dried upon his breast."

That was the end of Faulstich's story. We asked Ben der if he believed—here. In this bright, holiday town with the sound of music and tramcars and the laughter of children in our ears.

LITTLE STORIES FOR BEDTIME

BY THORNTON W. BURGESS.

Stop and look and listen, too, in places which are new to you.

Frumpy had been taught that by old Mrs. Possum just as soon as he was out of bed he was to get up and look little, inquisitive nose of his into all about the room.

But Frumpy was just a heartless little fellow and he would not do that. He would just lie there and look at the ceiling and think of the things that he had done during the night.

What was it all about? asked Frumpy when at last he found himself in a hole. He had been there for some time and he was very tired.

He had been there for some time and he was very tired. He had been there for some time and he was very tired. He had been there for some time and he was very tired.

He had been there for some time and he was very tired. He had been there for some time and he was very tired. He had been there for some time and he was very tired.

He had been there for some time and he was very tired. He had been there for some time and he was very tired. He had been there for some time and he was very tired.

He had been there for some time and he was very tired. He had been there for some time and he was very tired. He had been there for some time and he was very tired.

He had been there for some time and he was very tired. He had been there for some time and he was very tired. He had been there for some time and he was very tired.

He had been there for some time and he was very tired. He had been there for some time and he was very tired. He had been there for some time and he was very tired.
